	e-Learning comprises all forms of electronically supported learning & teaching systems. ICTs serve as specific media to implement the learning process through the computer and network-enabled transfer of skills and knowledge. Applications & processes include Web-based learning, computer-based learning, virtual classrooms, digital collaboration, etc. It can be self-paced or instructor-led and includes media in the form of text, image, animation, streaming video and audio. ICT for Development, Education and Training is a major cooperation field between Africa and Europe. In education, the effective use of ICT offers new ways in which the quality, effectiveness and flexibility of higher education can be improved. ICT when integrated into education have the capacities to improve the delivery of	e-infrastructures - consisting of a combination of ICT-based resources, such as computers, networks, and scientific data repositories facilitating global resource sharing and collaborative research - are key enablers for virtual global research communities and drivers of socio-economic development. To be able to fulfil their missions, African research and higher education institutions need access to the global research and education network infrastructure. Unlike their peers on other continents, most African institutions do currently not have such an access. Within the Africa-EU Strategic Partnership (namely P8), the AUC and the EC have given highest priority to the AfricaConnect initiative as an early deliverable with the objective to support the African research and higher	The health sector is relying increasingly on advanced ICT to make healthcare more effective and more efficient. Examples: alerting and management support systems will use innovative data analysis and integration techniques such as data/semantic mining, information integration, decision support, and RFID-based intelligent medication delivery. Applied to medical databases, such techniques will permit health professionals to predict, detect, and monitor health problems. All relevant stakeholders will also be involved in investigating how ICT can help predict/assess risk, and manage large-scale health crises. e-Health is definitely a major ICT research priority of common interest and benefit for the two continents.	In today's society, individuals and organisations are, on one hand, confronted with an ever growing load of information and, on the other, with increasing demands for knowledge and skills. To cope with this, we need to link content, knowledge and learning, making content and knowledge more accessible, interactive and usable over time by humans and machines alike. Europe and Africa, with their unique cultural heritage and creative potential, are well placed to exploit this paradigm shift, becoming key players in the knowledge economy

	Despite the indisputable role of innovation in productivity growth, access to new technologies by developing countries and least developed countries remains one of the most contested areas of international economic regulation. The persistent and deepening "innovation divide" between industrialised nations, where most research and development investment occurs, and the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries who rely primarily on imports of technology to enhance domestic supplies of technical knowledge, suggests that existing global policies directed at promoting technology diffusion and increasing access to technical knowledge have been wholly inadequate (© Ruth L. Okediji). This session will strive to further discuss the	Mobile banking (m-Banking / SMS Banking) is a term used for performing balance checks, account transactions, payments, credit applications etc. via a mobile device such as a mobile phone or a personal digital assistant (PDA). The earliest mobile banking services was offered via SMS. With the introduction of the first primitive smart phones with WAP support enabling the use of the mobile web in 1999, the first European banks started to offer mobile banking on this platform to their customers. Africa probably boast the most advanced, oldest and most successful examples of mobile banking solutions on the planet today. It is not difficult to understand why, as this is also one of the fastest growing markets for mobile telephony in the world.	Technological change drives deep transformation in the way we live and participate in society. New requirements are emerging for social inclusion, access to public services and lifelong participation. ICT can go a long way towards addressing the challenges of independent living and inclusion by, for example, extending the time during which elderly people can live independently in their preferred environment or providing a basis for a new generation of inclusive products and services that will help integrate people who are at risk of exclusion.	One of the main objectives of the EuroAfrica-ICT project is to identify ICT research priorities addressing cooperation between Europe and Africa. Once identified and analysed in detail, these priorities will lead to recommendations which may be taken into consideration in facilitating the rapid emergence of Euro-African collaborative projects addressing identified ICT research areas. To identify these ICT research priorities, the EuroAfrica-ICT Partnership is taking a wide range of sources into consideration: among them an extensive consultation of participants in the EuroAfrica-ICT cooperation forums...
